

Mt. Equity Zendo Zephyr- March 2011

Last of the Arhats Are Now at Mt. Equity

Arhat is a sanskrit word meaning “one who is worthy of alms.” The original disciples of the Buddha, they have reached the state of ultimate freedom. Traditionally, there are sixteen of them and they can be found as carvings in rocks at various temples in China. The above three came from just such a place, though they were originally rubbings on rice paper.

In 2000, Nanso Cleaver, a Zen practitioner at MEZ and artist in Lewisburg, told us of an exhibition of these rubbings while she was working on an art project at Bucknell University. Because they were given to Bucknell as an endowment, MEZ was not permitted to purchase them. But they were generously loaned to us and permission was granted to copy them. They were put into frames and hung in what is now known as “The Arhat Hall.”

Though MEZ was so grateful to have thirteen Arhats, the missing Arhats remained a mystery. Just recently Nanso came across the other three sages and loaned them to MEZ to be copied.

Zen Master Keizan Jokin, considered the second founder of Soto Zen in Japan, has this to say about the Arhats in the ceremony which venerates them:

According to the Sutras, every Arhat is in possession of three supernatural visions or six supernatural powers, and has gone through the experience of the eight levels of deliverance. If one respectfully serves meals to them along with incense and candle light and if one sincerely prays before them to realize a certain wish, it will surely be granted. There is nothing that is beyond their power. Despite a distance of millions of millions of miles, they can descend into the hall of this rite at once within a second as short as the moment in which a wrestler bends and stretches his arm, receiving the alms offering like this.

May all who come to MEZ benefit from the example, inspiration and presence of the sixteen Arhats.

Thomas Merton, O.C.S.O. (1915-1968) was a Catholic monk in the Trappist order and wrote extensively not only about issues such as nuclear war and social justice, but about the importance and need for inter-faith understanding between Christians and Buddhists. In an address to the Fellowship of Reconciliation he called the Buddhist teacher Ven. Thich Nhat Hanh his brother.

There is a picture hanging on our wall of Thomas Merton meeting with H.H. The Dalai Lama on his famous trip to Asia.

RIVERS, TREES AND PEOPLE

Inter-Connection Ceremony on Susquehanna River May 15th

Up until World War II, Thailand's forests covered 75% of the total country. Today, just 60 years later, the forests have dwindled to 15% of the total country. Thai Monk Phra Prayudh believes this rapid destruction is due to three wrong assumptions regarding nature which were introduced to Thailand by Westerners. The first wrong assumption is that humans are separate from the environment. The second is that humans are in control of nature. The third wrong view is that happiness comes from material possessions.

Because Thailand is a predominantly Buddhist country, some monks, particularly those who live in the forest, have protested the destruction of the forests by "ordaining trees." Saffron-colored Buddhist robes were draped over the trees as a way of saying, "What you do to these trees is what you do to the Buddha." In other words, our world is so inter-connected that what we do to something else is, in the end, what we do to ourselves.

But we don't need to go to Thailand or the Amazon Rain Forest to witness environmental destruction. We only need to look out of our windows on to the gas wells in our backyards. When we look at the tremendous amount of fresh water needed for the wells, most of which is not recoverable, and the invasion into our state forest land, is what we are seeing any different than what the Thai people see? As Buddhist priests, Abbess Dai-En and I feel a deep concern about the rapid rate at which changes are taking place in our local area because we wonder how sustainable such quick growth is and how it will affect not only the future landscape but the health of the people who live here.

It is doubtful that these problems in our local environment will be going away anytime soon, or that everything is going to be okay. Moreover, solutions do not lie in pointing our fingers at "this company" or "that legislation." What is needed is deep thinking, or re-thinking about our place in nature and our cultural norms. The environmental crisis is not something that can be addressed simply by one person, one action, or one religion. Though ethical inspiration and action from individuals and religious communities is important, on-going attention and cooperation from many fields including politics, economics, and science is essential.

For our part, Mount Equity Zendo will be planning a ceremony on the Susquehanna River to acknowledge, one, our deep gratitude to the river for giving life to this area and, two, to promise to protect the river now and into the distant future. Inspired by the Thai monks who have begun the practice of ordaining trees, Abbess Dai-En is planning a ceremony at the river to recognize our deep interconnectedness. You are all welcome to join us at the river. More details will be given later.

May all beings enter the pure stream of Buddha-wisdom.
